Agoraphobic Anna Fox's life is confined to her New York apartment where she has arranged her daily affairs to ensure she does not have to go out. Safe in her small world she passes time watching old noir movies, drinking Merlot and spying on her neighbours including the Russells, a new family with whom she becomes obsessed. When she witnesses a shocking murder and cover-up from her kitchen window no one believes her. That carefully managed sense of safety soon begins to unravel. Revelations about Anna's past keep the twists and turns coming and the similarities to Hitchcock's classic Rear Window are not accidental. A smartly written tale of suspense with an unreliable narrator.

Waiting for the magic moment to make that big decision? Delay just a bit longer in order to read Daniel H. Pink's latest provocative book, When: The Scientific Secrets of Perfect Timing. Exploring the old adage, timing is everything, Pink delves into global circadian patterns and its influence over mood, decisions and events. Making it personal, Pink links timing with chronotypes, the manifestations of one's own peak and trough (aka post lunch slump) moments throughout the day. Being cognizant of these patterns, Pink argues, is key to knowing when to ask for the raise, schedule a meeting, pop the question. Turns out there is a magic moment, after all, for making that big decision. Question is, will you take it?
